A Hanover man was arrested by Duxbury Police last week after allegedly drunkenly crashing into an elderly woman's home, then assaulting her when she tried to help.

Michael Hennebury, age 37, of Hanover drove his pickup truck off the road and onto the lawn of an Abrams Hill home around 9:30 p.m. on Feb. 8, according to a release from Police Chief Matthew Clancy.

The vehicle got stuck, and a woman in her 70s went outside to see what was going on.

When she approached the truck Hennebury got out and kicked her several times, according to police.

When the woman fell to the ground he continued to kick her in the head and face. Officer Tom Johnson arrived on scene and found Hennebury attempting to drive the vehicle out of the snow.

Hennebury was arrested and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (shod foot), assault and battery on a person over 60, operating under the influence of liquor (fourth offense), and numerous traffic violations.

Although she had visible injuries, the victim refused medical treatment and returned to her home, police said.
